

America's Foreign Policy

Emerging from World War II as the most powerful economic power on Earth, the United States changed its foreign policy dramatically. It took the lead in founding the United Nations. The United States created a system of alliances, including the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO).

United States has always played a constructive role around the world. Economically speaking, U.S. should ensure the stability of an international financial system, to promote economic recovery where necessary to prevent collapse that would threaten the interest of United States.

Defense:

President Obama's foreign policy team has pursued national security policies that keep American people safe. Ending the war in Iraq brought a sense of security to Americans, thanks to the extraordinary servicemen and women that fought to devastate al Qaeda's leadership. Presently, the main purpose is to continue to set priorities to be safe, strong and prosperous around the world with America's national security using all elements of power to protect the American people. An example that we can mention is the to keep "peace and security of a world without nuclear weapons", developing practical steps to move in that direction. We find that Iran and North Korean have violated their obligations. Obama's administration has developed new mechanisms to support the growth of safe and secure nuclear power in ways that reduce the spread of dangerous technologies. We declared that the fundamental role of U.S. nuclear forces is to deter nuclear attacks against the U.S. and our allies and partners to prevent nuclear terrorism.

Environment:

Obama's administration has committed to put America on a path to a clean energy economy that improves our energy security by reducing our use of fossil fuels to drive a new era of American innovation in our planet. The President has committed to investing $150 billion in clean energy research, U.S. will be a leader in addressing global climate change by making contributions and engaging other countries to do the same by working to reduce emissions and pursue clean energy.

Humanitarian:

As member of President's Obama's foreign policy team, I address that is our duty to provide assistance to vulnerable people around the world. We recognized and praised the work of humanitarian workers who provide any type of assistance that take any action in global aid. Around the world, humanitarian aid workers must be free to serve without fear for their safety, while every human being must be able to pursue their aspirations in peace, dignity and security. Last month, we celebrated World Humanitarian Day; meanwhile Syrian regime continues to brutally attack its citizens and restrict the delivery of humanitarian aid to over 2.5 million people in need. The President approved an additional $12 million in U.S. humanitarian assistance to support those most affected by the crisis in Syria, with these additional funds, the United States is now providing over $76 million in assistance for food, water, medical supplies, clothing, hygiene kits, and other humanitarian relief to those most urgently in need. As a leading provider of humanitarian relief to those affected by the crisis in Syria, the United States urges all countries around the world to contribute with any humanitarian aid to those in need.

In conclusion, the Nation's Foreign Policy should be based on liberalism, having in mind we should all pursue goals that benefit everyone with an optimistic view of foreign affairs. Mutual cooperation of nations should evolve in a more peaceful way, having in mind how the identity principles affect foreign policy.

Understanding how Realists' viewpoint is that power equals dominance, on the other hand; Liberals' power enables an actor to accomplish its desire goals or shares goals. World nations should follow philosopher Kant's answers; reciprocal agreements by cooperation, having a democracy will increase peace in every nation and lastly by trade promoting social economy, creating political ties and peace around the world.
